bach's septet in A for piano, clarinet, horn, violin, viola and cello. All except the Beethoven composition were heard for the first time in this city. Such an outpour of novelties was enough to stagger the mind of any listener and to stagger the mind of any listener and to paralyze any attempt at proper critical consideration. In so far as Mr. Hure's quintet is concerned, however, it may be faid that the composition belongs to the world of dreams wherein things follow one another shadowy, unsubstantial and without connection. It meandered peacefully through its three monterrupted movements and finished ninterrupted movements and finished itself with a high chord of gentle sweet ness. The other three novelties should be heard again, not all in one prome, and perhaps they will.

gramme, and perhaps they will.

Mr. Huss is a local composer, whose idea was to set four short lyrics in such a manner that the voice should not dominate but be woven into the musical web as if it were an additional instrument. The experiment has been tried in other forms, but the public is still tting up and viewing the singer as the

His programme consisted of the first movement from Tschaikowsky's concerto, the Bach chaconne and some other pieces, including Barasate's "Zigeuner-weisen." In his playing the violinist showed feeling, taste and dignity of style. His tone was deficient in musical quality, except in certain slower passages, and his bowing in the flexibility which produces a wide range of tone coloring. His intonation was generally good, though not flawless. His rhythm and technic were also good.
